The Case for Generic Drugs

by Cy Brickfield

Of the $12 billion American consumers spent last year for prescription drug products (paying the highest prices in the world), an estimated $500 million was wasted in buying brand-name drugs instead of equivalent generic products.

Until recently consumers had little choice in the matter.

Years ago, when drugs were manufactured on a relatively small scale, pharmacists were responsible for choosing which ingredients, from which manufacturers, they would use in compounding prescriptions ordered by doctors for their patients. In short, they used their own judgment as to quality and cost.

But with the tremendous increase in the number of new drugs, and the enormous economic success of the drug industry in the years following World War II, duplication and counterfeiting of prescription drug products became widespread. Many of the counterfeit drugs placed on the market were not as safe and effective as the brand-name products they were imitating. This not only posed a serious health threat to consumers, but also an economic threat to the large, brand-name drug manufacturers who dominate the drug industry.

The response of the drug industry to this threat was to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on a major lobbying effort to enact new state laws and regulations restricting the use of non-brand-name drug products. The industry urged that pharmacists be required to dispense only the brand-name products nearly always designated by physicians on prescription forms. In the 1950's, these so-called "anti-substitution" laws and regulations were enacted by most states on the grounds that they would protect public health and safety.

These new requirements made prescription forms inviolable legal instruments. The pharmacist had to dispense the manufacturers' brand-name product designated on the prescription form; the patient had to pay for that product without choice or question.

The new system was a boon to the large manufacturers, who could afford to send armies of "detailmen" (salesmen) to physicians' offices throughout the country to promote their brand-name products. The busy physicians began to rely more and more on the detailmen and on drug industry advertising in medical journals for their information on new drug products. As a result, physicians were writing nine out of 10 prescriptions for brand-name products.

By the 1960's, however, basic changes in national drug laws and regulation eliminated much of the need for continued strict anti-substitution statutes.

The 1962 Kefauver Amendments to the Food and Drug Act required, for the first time, that all drugs be effective as well as safe, thus eliminating the problem of counterfeit drugs.

Thanks to these changes, good manufacturing practices — for both generic and brand-name drug products — are now required, and are closely monitored by FDA. Manufacturing facilities are inspected, each new batch of antibiotics is tested by the FDA before it is sold, and random samples of other drug products are taken continuously. Furthermore, applications to produce chemically equivalent generic drug products will be approved only with "demonstrable proof of equivalency."

Today all drugs, whether brand-name or generic, must meet the same standards of effectiveness, safety, and quality.

By the late 1960's despite the profit-motivated protestations of the major drug manufacturers, it had become apparent that there was no longer a need for strict anti-substitution laws. Among the conclusions drawn by several of the nation's leading scientific and pharmacological experts were these:

"On the basis of available evidence, lack of clinical equivalency among chemical equivalents meeting all official standards has been grossly exaggerated as a major hazard to the public health" (Final Report of the Task Force on Prescription Drugs, U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, February 7, 1969).

"On the basis of data we have accrued to date, we cannot conclude that there is a significant difference in quality between the generic and brand-name products tested" (Dr. Henry F. Simmons, Director of FDA's Bureau of Drugs, FDA Consumer Magazine, March, 1973).

Unfortunately, the myth that "generic" somehow means "inferior" or "second-rate" dies hard. Because of sophisticated advertising and lobbying campaigns by the drug industry, it was not until the mid-1970's that a broad-based coalition of groups representing older people, union members, and organized consumers were able to bring about important changes in anti-substitution laws.

Today, 35 states have repealed these laws; 20 of them permit pharmacists to substitute less-expensive equivalent generic drug products when filling prescriptions (unless the physician expressly prohibits in writing the substitution), while six states now require pharmacists to substitute whenever possible.

Another major barrier to drug substitution and drug price savings was toppled earlier this year when the FDA officially endorsed a Drug Substitution Formulary (list of drugs) developed by New York State.

In order to implement their substitution laws, some states require development of a formulary which indicates to the pharmacist which drugs are (or are not) therapeutically equivalent and, therefore, are (or are not) interchangeable.

A "positive" formulary — which lists the drug that can be substituted — is considered to offer the most protection to patients. Prior to the FDA endorsement, however, conflicting opinions by professionals about the bioequivalence of certain drugs meant that most positive formularies were limited in scope.

The New York State formulary, which lists more than 2,000 brand-name and generic drugs, is the most comprehensive yet developed. It lists only drugs on which there is no question of bioequivalence and only drugs whose manufacturers meet high quality control standards. According to the FDA, other states can copy the New York State formulary with complete confidence.

Winning the battle over generic drugs is only the first step in our struggle to improve this country's drug delivery system — a system which too often makes the ill poor and the poor ill. Anti-competitive practices and excessive drug industry advertising, unreasonable profits and patent protections, and irrational prescribing of drug products should all be subjects of concern.

But by educating the public about generic drugs, we can at least help bring the skyrocketing cost of prescriptions under control.

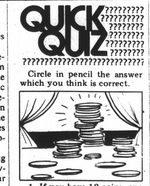
QUICK QUIZ

Circle in pencil the answer which you think is correct.



1. If you have 12 coins, one of which is lighter than the others, what would be the minimum number of times you'd have to weigh them in a balance scale to determine the lighter one? (a) 6 (b) 3 (c) 12?

2. If you have a View-Master, how many different subjects can you see with it? (a) over 400 (b) around 100 (c) less than 40?

ANSWERS
1. (b) Divide the coins into three sets of four each. If two balance exactly, the third set contains the lighter coin. The third set, then, should be divided in two and weighed. Then the lighter set of this divided and weighed the third time.
2. (a) There are over 400 topics available in View-Master and Talking View-Master packets of 3-reel, 3-D slides from GAF. You can see "Flash Gordon," "Happy Days," American History, Disney characters and much more.

Bless The Bride

If you've given a bride a wedding gift recently, you might be interested to know that the custom is observed officially in parts of Scotland. Some towns even have a fund from which they give these wedding presents once a year.

One village gives a wedding gift to the tallest, shortest, oldest and youngest brides of the year. There is one problem. The brides have to put in a claim for the gift.

There is never any difficulty about girls claiming to be the youngest bride. There are not so many for the title of tallest and shortest. But, year after year, there is no one at all interested in the gift for the oldest.
